

The best place to retire

When people consider an ideal place to retire, it's natural to think about white sand beaches, hot climates, and endless sunny days. The Global Retirement Index (GRI) takes into account different factors, such as

- life expectancy
- happiness level
- quality of environment (air quality, water, sanitation)
- financial security of elderly people, based on income, pension, inflation
- governance (political stability, corruption levels, government effectiveness).

Global Retirement Index (GRI) is the survey published by the French company Natixis. The team examines 18 well-being factors and reveals the best countries to retire in the world.

According to 2022 annual report, Norway is the most retirement-friendly country in the list.

It achieved the highest score in the Health category, mainly because of its average life expectancy, which is 83 years old (or 9 years longer than the average in the world), and also in the Governance category. It also has well-developed organizations for elderly people, and social media pays a lot of attention to their needs.
